

Can a Democrat beat Trump in 2020?

Asked at Lambstock Music Fest, Chico

Tracy McConachie
registered nurse

If they can come together to support one strong candidate like Bernie Sanders, I think we can. If people write in other Democrats not on the ballot, then we won't.

Richard Clapp
retired teacher

I think it's a done deal that Trump will lose, big time. A lot of the important, influential politicians who say they support him won't vote for him. They're embarrassed to have that guy.

Kelly Broman
teacher

Several of them can. The important part is to have everybody vote. We've said this before, but this election is important for everybody to vote because we do stand a chance.

Benson
social justice advocate

That's exactly the question. It's not what position you have on issues, but "Who can beat Trump?" If we don't get a Democrat in there, we're screwed. Kamala Harris can beat Trump. I saw her get him on the ropes over segregation and she kicked his ass.

Give your CD rates a Raise!

The Net Real Return on traditional Bank CDs after taxes and inflation often result in negative returns. Market-Linked CDs may stay ahead of taxes and inflation while providing the same level of FDIC Insurance coverage and principal guarantee when held to maturity.

- Market exposure with no risk of principal loss when held to maturity
- Issued by Large National Banks
- FDIC Insurance Coverage up to the statutory limit

Market-linked CDs are typically longer-term investments. FDIC insurance is subject to FDIC limits. Principal invested in excess of FDIC limits is not insured and is subject to the credit risk of the issuer. Principal protection only applies if the CDs are held to maturity. If not held to maturity, a market-linked CD is subject to market risk, and trading in the secondary market may be thin or even nonexistent, and the price per CD may be less than par. Total payment at maturity may be less than what would be received if you had invested in the underlying asset(s) directly. Some market-linked CDs may limit participation in the underlying asset(s). Market Linked CD returns may vary from the indices' or assets' actual performance. Additional risks may apply based on the specific issue.
