Strangest food you've been served at a holiday meal?

Asked in downtown Chico

A turkey stuffed with cannabis. It was [for] Thanksgiving. It was delicious. It was in my younger days, back before I stopped smoking cannabis. We called it "Danksgiving."

The strangest thing I was served was bear meat. I thought it was just a roast, and then I tasted it and I was like, "Oh my god. What is this horrifying taste?" It literally tasted like trash. And I thought, "What do bears eat?"

I used to live in Finland and they served this thing called mämmi. It's this holiday Easter food. It's made out of molasses and some other ingredients and it's wrapped up in a piece of birch bark. It tastes really sweet, like eating syrup basically.

This is a really common one, but I still think it's super weird: marshmallows on yams, especially when it's canned yams with marshmallows on it.

Would you like to earn more on your Bank CDs and Cash?

Learn how to get EQUITY like returns with the FDIC protection of a Certificate of Deposit (CD).

Give your CD rates a Raise!

The Net Real Return on traditional Bank CDs after taxes and inflation often result in negative returns. Market-Linked CDs may stay ahead of taxes and inflation while providing the same level of FDIC Insurance coverage and principal guarantee when held to maturity.

- Market exposure with no risk of principal loss when held to maturity
- Issued by Large National Banks
- FDIC Insurance Coverage up to the statutory limit

Market-linked CDs are typically longer-term investments. FDIC insurance is subject to FDIC limits. Principal invested in excess of FDIC limits is not insured and is subject to the credit risk of the issuer. Principal protection only applies if the CDs are held to maturity. If not held to maturity, a market-linked CD is subject to market risk, and trading in the secondary market may be thin or even nonexistent, and the price per CD may be less than par. Total payment at maturity may be less than what would be received if you had invested in the underlying asset(s) directly. Some market-linked CDs may limit participation in the underlying asset(s). Market Linked CD returns may vary from the indices' or assets' actual performance. Additional risks may apply based on the specific issue.
