The painting "Ivan the Terrible and his Son Ivan," by Ilya Yefimovich [Repin]. Ivan either hit his son in the head with a staff or threw him against the wall so violently that he suffers a mortal head injury. It's astounding because of how it captures a horrific moment. Ivan's eyes are touching, haunting and spooky.

I like the "The Seasons," by Alphonse Mucha. I can't pick one that I love, so I have to pick all four pieces. Each has a life-sized woman that represent a season.

A powerful piece called "Girl Frisking Soldier," by the British street artist Banksy. It shows a little girl patting down or frisking a soldier. It represents two extremes.

The Pet Sounds album by The Beach Boys. It was a culmination of Brian Wilson's creativity before he went into his dark years. It combined everything that preceded him by way of classical music, rock, etc., into a new blended album that every musician to this day admires.

Market-linked CDs are typically longer-term investments. FDIC insurance is subject to FDIC limits. Principal invested in excess of FDIC limits is not insured and is subject to the credit risk of the issuer. Principal protection only applies if the CDs are held to maturity. If not held to maturity, a market-linked CD is subject to market risk, and trading in the secondary market may be thin or even nonexistent, and the price per CD may be less than par. Total payment at maturity may be less than what would be received if you had invested in the underlying asset(s) directly. Some market-linked CDs may limit participation in the underlying asset(s). Market Linked CD returns may vary from the indices' or assets' actual performance. Additional risks may apply based on the specific issue. May not be suitable for all investors. Investors should carefully read the related term sheet and prospectus and/or disclosure statement before investing. Structured product CDs may be treated differently than traditional CDs for tax purposes and investors should consult their tax advisors.
