It's safe to assume that we've all seen a weather forecast and muttered, "I'll believe it when I see it." How do we decide when to take warnings about natural hazards seriously? And when do we brush them off, assuming the forecasters are just crying wolf? At this installment of Science Distilled, hear from the researchers probing this decision-making process and the science behind communicating the risks of hazards like extreme heat, earthquakes, and snowstorms.

The Science Distilled lecture series was created by Desert Research Institute and The Discovery to make cutting-edge science approachable through presentations on current and curious topics held at hip locations in a social atmosphere.
